YOUR RESET PROFILE

The Disconnected

A way to stay in the room while keeping the most feeling part of you somewhere no one could reach.

Before you read on

This isn't a personality test. It is a map of why you keep ending up in the same relationship, with different people — and what is actually driving it, underneath everything you have already tried.

You answered ten questions. What came back is a pattern — one of five the RESET Method works with most often. The pattern isn't who you are. It's a strategy you built, probably in childhood, probably very early. It worked then. That's why it stayed.

What you are about to read describes experiences you will most likely recognise but may never have truly acknowledged. If it lands, it will feel less like being analysed and more like being recognised.

Read slowly. Underline what lands. Notice what you want to argue with — that's often where the real material is.

You may have just thought something like: this is longer than I expected, and I have things I should be doing.

I want to pause here, because that thought is not an observation about the profile. It is the first appearance of the thing this profile is about.

Notice the word. Should.

This is not a report. A report you skim, agree with, and forget — and if that were all this was, you would be right to put it down. It is the first step of the change: what happens when you give your attention to yourself, page after page, with nothing to show anyone at the end of it.

So: read it through once, now, without doing anything. No pen. No notes. You are not being asked to fix anything today — only to read.

The change does not live in the reading. It lives in one practice, near the end, that asks something of you. That part can wait until you have finished. Not here. There.

And if you cannot come back to it today — which is likely, and I am not going to pretend otherwise — do not simply promise yourself you will. You have made that promise before.

Open your calendar. Find ten minutes this week. Put your own name in it.

That is not admin. That is the practice, in its smallest possible form, done before you have read what the practice is.

You will not feel like doing it. Book it before you feel like it.

You may notice something straight away

I am about to tell you something that may surprise you — and as you read it, you may notice how little you feel.

There is grief underneath this.

If your first response is no, I am fine — this is all quite interesting, actually, that response is precisely the thing, and it is happening as you read.

Notice your body. Or rather — notice that you have gone slightly numb. That the words are arriving without landing. That you can feel a very faint distance opening between you and this page, like glass. A cool flatness across the chest. Nothing much at all.

That is not neutrality. That is the pattern, running, right now, on this page.

Numbness is not the absence of feeling. It is what a very old, very effective wall does when something gets close. It is still protecting you. It does not know you would survive being reached.

Stay. Notice the flatness. It is information.

What you're living

People who love you have told you that you disappear. That you're there and not there at once. They've called you cold, unavailable, hard to reach — and you've let them believe it, because the truth is harder to say.

The truth is the opposite of cold. You disappear because you feel too much, not too little. Somewhere along the way, feeling everything at full volume became dangerous, so you learned to step back from your own life just enough to survive it — present in body, withdrawn in the place that actually feels.

What no one sees is how lonely it is in there. The relationships that should feel closest often feel like they're happening through glass. You love people, and you are alone with them at the same time. You have grieved that quietly, for years, without ever quite letting yourself call it grief.

You are not detached. You are someone whose depth was never met with the safety it needed to come forward — and who found an intelligent way to keep it safe until it could.

And underneath it all, the question you rarely let yourself finish: if you let someone all the way in, and they saw how much is actually in there — would they stay?

The belief underneath

It is not safe to feel this much. If I let it all in, it will overwhelm me — so I will stay a step back from my own life, where nothing can reach me too hard.

You may not say those words to yourself. But your body lives by them. You keep a small, constant distance between you and your own experience — not because you don't care, but because caring, at full strength, once felt like more than you could hold.

THREE

Why you built it

This almost always begins somewhere feeling was genuinely unsafe — a period, or a moment, where what you felt was too big for anyone around you to help you hold. So your system did the intelligent thing: it turned the volume down. Not on the pain alone — on everything, because the dial doesn't come with separate controls.

When you turn down fear, you turn down joy. When you turn down grief, you turn down love. That was the cost, and your system paid it without asking, because staying flooded was not survivable and stepping back was.

And it worked. It kept you upright through something that might otherwise have swept you away. It was not coldness. It was a brilliant piece of engineering by a child lowering the volume on a world that was, for a while, too loud to bear.

You were never broken. You were protecting yourself. Going quiet was never indifference — it was the most intelligent thing a young system could do with more feeling than it could safely hold. The problem isn't that you did it. It's that the dial is still turned down, long after the danger has passed.

FOUR

Why insight hasn't changed it

You have almost certainly seen this pattern before. You may have recognised it — in therapy, in a journal, in a 2am conversation with a friend. You may have promised yourself, more than once, that this time you would stay present. Let someone in. Not disappear the moment it got close.

And understanding it hasn't changed it.

That is not a failure of self-awareness. You clearly have plenty — you just took an assessment about your own patterns and read this far without flinching.

The reason insight doesn't change anything is that the pattern lives in the subconscious — and the subconscious was not persuaded by anything you worked out with your conscious mind. It was written long before you had words, and it keeps running underneath your best intentions: in the way your body pulls back the instant closeness gets real, in the flatness that arrives just when you'd most like to feel something, in the distance that closes over you again no matter how many times you decide to stay.

You can understand this pattern completely and still feel it fire. Which is why the next pages aren't more explanation. They're a first move.

FIVE · THE PRACTICE — THE HEART OF THIS

Should into want

Awareness is the first move. It is not the whole of it — and this is the piece almost everyone misses.

It is why you can understand your pattern completely and still watch it repeat, despite your best efforts. It is why the therapy, the books, the years of doing the homework changed how well you could describe the problem without changing the problem itself.

Understanding speaks to the conscious mind. Your pattern was never written there. It was written underneath, in the subconscious, and it does not update because you had a realisation — it updates when you give it a new experience. That is the whole formula, and it is simple: awareness, then choice, then action. You have the awareness. This is where the other two begin.

TEN MINUTES. ONE PIECE OF PAPER.

I am telling you the cost up front, because I know what you are about to do with it. You are about to look at three steps, feel the weight of them, and decide — reasonably, and almost without noticing — that this deserves more time than you have today, and that you will come back to it properly.

You will not come back to it properly. You have never once come back to something properly that was only for you.

So let us be exact. Ten minutes. Not an hour. Not a weekend. Ten.

You will need paper, because this does not work in your head. The part of you that runs the pattern is very comfortable in your head, and has been winning arguments there for thirty years.

And somewhere around step two you may notice that you are feeling nothing at all — that the words are going in, that you are doing the exercise correctly, and that none of it is reaching you. That numbness is not proof the exercise doesn't apply to you. It is the pattern, working exactly as designed: the volume turned down the moment something gets close. And underneath the flatness, if you stay with it, there is often grief — quiet, long-postponed, waiting to be let through. You do not have to force it. Just do not mistake the numbness for an answer.

Notice it. Then do the ten minutes anyway.

IF YOU CANNOT DO IT TODAY

Then do this instead. Now, before you close the profile.

Open your calendar. Find ten minutes this week. Put your own name in the slot. Not “reflection.” Not “profile.”
Your name.

That is not preparation for the practice. That is the practice — the first act of discerning you have made in a very long time, and it takes eleven seconds.

Then, when the ten minutes arrive, come back to this page.

STEP ONE

Empty out your shoulds

A should is not a decision you made. It is a program installed from outside — a rule you absorbed, young, about how you had to be in order to be loved. You never agreed to it. Which is exactly why you are allowed to question it.

People who learned to disappear keep more rules than they realise. Write down every rule you live by, each beginning with “I should.” The first four are the ones this pattern almost always carries — keep the ones that are yours, cross out the ones that aren’t, and fill the rest with your own. For each, name whose voice it is.

THE SHOULD I CARRY	WHOSE VOICE IS IT?	BODY
I should keep the deepest part of myself to myself.
I should not need anyone to sit with me in it.
I should stay calm and unbothered no matter what.
I should not let anyone see how much I actually feel.
I should...
I should...
I should...

STEP TWO

Feel which ones are yours

Go back through your list and say each one aloud — but change one word. Replace I should with I want to. Don't decide with your mind. Your body already knows, and it answers faster than thought.

A want opens you. Room, breath, energy moving toward something. A green light.

A should closes you. Tightness, a bracing in the chest, something in you going small. A red light.

Mark each line in the Body column: green if it opens you, red if it closes you. The reds were never yours — installed from outside, worn so long they feel like character. The greens are you. That is the whole exercise: your body sorting what you actually want from what you were trained to carry.

IF YOU WANT TO GO ONE LEVEL DEEPER

This is the part that does the real work, and it takes one more word: because.

Take any line and finish it. I should keep everyone comfortable — because... Then do the same with its want: I want to say what I think — because... Let the honest answer come, not the tidy one.

Watch where each because points. When a line is a should — a rule installed from outside — the reason almost always lands on someone else: because she would be hurt, because they would think less of me, because it would cause a scene. When a line is truly a want, the reason comes home to you: because I am tired, because it matters to me, because I would finally feel met.

That is the tell. Not the rule itself, but who the because is about. A should is for them. A want is for you. Once you have felt that difference in your own sentences, you will never quite un-feel it.

STEP THREE

Act on one want

Take one red — a should that closed you. Underneath it is a want it has been holding down. Find that want, and this week do one small, survivable thing that honours it instead of the should.

If “I should not let anyone see how much I feel” came up red, the want beneath it is likely “I want to be fully known by someone safe.” So this week, you tell one safe person one true thing you’d normally keep behind the glass.

That's the move: not resisting the should with willpower, but following the want it was burying.

You are not trying to become a different person. You are handing your subconscious one piece of evidence that the old rule isn't true — and evidence is the only language it updates in. One want, acted on, outweighs a hundred you merely understood. This is why the page has room for more than four shoulds: you will come back to it. Each time, a new rule, the same three moves.

SIX

What shifts when it resolves

You come back. Not in a flood — the fear was always that feeling would drown you, and it won't. The distance starts to close. Colour returns to ordinary things. You feel what you feel, more often, and it does not consume you.

The people who love you stop meeting glass. Closeness stops costing you the retreat that used to follow it. You are not less deep — you were always the deepest person in the room. You are finally able to let that depth be seen.

The loneliness that lived underneath it all — the ache of being unreachable even to the people right beside you — begins to lift, because you are finally reachable, on your own terms, to the people who are safe.

YOUR NEXT STEP

Where this goes next

Recognising the pattern is the easy part. Understanding where the distance came from — and how to close it — is the work.

Your Knight in Shining Armour is built on a single idea: your relationship struggles were never the real problem — they're the map. The distance you keep has been pointing you straight to the wound underneath it, and the book is how you learn to read that, and rewrite it.

It begins with an airport in Hong Kong and traces back to a classroom in Romania, where a version of me decided, very young, that she would never feel small again. If the Disconnected is your pattern, that story will feel like your own.

A NOTE ON WHAT THIS PROFILE IS — AND ISN'T

Recognition is the first move

This profile puts a pattern into words. It doesn't resolve it.

Recognition is the first move. It turns a diffuse sense that something keeps happening into something with an outline you can work with. But a pattern this old, stored this deep, doesn't release through insight alone. If it did, this profile would be enough — and the clients who come to me after twenty years of therapy, perfectly aware of their patterns, wouldn't exist.

The practice in these pages is a beginning: a way to feel, in your body, that a rule you never chose can be put down. The book is how the deeper work is done.

Whatever you choose next, keep this profile. Come back to it in three months. Notice what has changed, what hasn't, and what you can now see that wasn't visible today.

The pattern was built over years. Seeing it clearly once is a good day. Changing it is a different piece of work — and it is absolutely possible.
