RESET METHOD™

BEFORE YOU READ THIS

This isn't a personality test. It's a map of something specific: the architecture running beneath the experiences you're having right now.

You answered ten questions. What came back is a pattern — one of five the RESET Method works with most often. The pattern isn't who you are. It's a strategy you built, probably in childhood, probably very early. It worked then. That's why it stayed.

The language on the next pages is written to describe something you already know but may never have had acknowledged. If it lands, it will feel less like being analysed and more like being recognised.

Read slowly. Underline what lands. Notice what you want to argue with — that's often where the real material is.

Valentina

ONE

What you're living

You know the two kinds. The relationship that is safe, steady, kind — and somehow flat, like a room with the air let out. And the one that is electric, consuming, alive — and somehow always just out of reach, or always costing you more than you can afford.

You have moved between them your whole life without quite understanding why. Leave the safe one because it feels like slow suffocation. Chase the alive one until it exhausts you. Wonder, each time, whether you are simply drawn to the wrong people.

And underneath it, a fear you rarely say out loud: that you are the problem. That you're too much, or too restless, or somehow built to sabotage the good ones. You are not. But the loneliness of never having safe and alive in the same person has worn a groove in you, and you've half-started to believe it might just be how you're made.

You are not self-destructive. Somewhere, love and safety stopped feeling like things that could exist in the same place — so your system filed them apart, and has been sending you toward half of what you need ever since.

And the question under all of it: is it actually possible — safe and alive, in one person — or is choosing between them simply the cost of being you?

TWO

The belief underneath

I cannot have safe and alive at once. Real desire comes at the price of security; real security comes at the price of aliveness.

So I take the love I could survive losing, because love I couldn't survive is too great a risk.

You may never have put it in those words. But you live it in your choosing — reaching for the unavailable one and calling it chemistry, settling for the safe one and calling it maturity, never quite believing a single person could be both the ground and the fire.

THREE

Why you built it

Somewhere in your history, the people who were safe were not the people who lit you up, and the people who lit you up were not safe. Maybe love in your early world came braided with unpredictability — warmth and withdrawal from the same hands — so that “exciting but uncertain” became the shape your body learned to read as love.

So your system did something clever and costly: it split them. Safety in one drawer, desire in another, never in the same person, because in your first experience of love they never were.

And it worked. It let you keep loving in a world where wanting all of it, from one person, wasn't safe. It was not self-sabotage. It was a brilliant adaptation to a template that had a flaw built into it.

You were never broken. You were protecting yourself. Choosing survivable love was never self-sabotage — it was a system that learned, early, that love and safety don't share a room, and adapted accordingly. The problem isn't the pattern. It's that the template was built with a flaw — and templates can be rebuilt.

FOUR

Why insight hasn't changed it

You have almost certainly seen this pattern before. You may have recognised it — in therapy, in a journal, in a 2am conversation with a friend. You may have promised yourself, more than once, that this time you would choose the steady one this time. Stay when it got good. Stop chasing the ones who keep you uncertain.

And understanding it hasn't changed it.

That is not a failure of self-awareness. You clearly have plenty — you just took an assessment about your own patterns and read this far without flinching.

The reason insight doesn't change anything is that the pattern lives in the subconscious — and the subconscious was not persuaded by anything you worked out with your conscious mind. It was written long before you had words, and it keeps running underneath your best intentions: in the cooling that arrives the moment a good one becomes truly available, in the pull toward the one who keeps you slightly uncertain, in the way steady love reads, in your body, as boredom rather than safety.

You can understand this pattern completely and still feel it fire. Which is why the next pages aren't more explanation. They're a first move.

Should into want

Awareness is the first move. It is not the whole of it — and this is the piece almost everyone misses. It is why you can understand your pattern completely and still feel it run. It is why the therapy, the books, the years of doing the homework changed how well you could describe the problem without changing the problem itself.

Understanding speaks to the conscious mind. Your pattern was never written there. It was written underneath, in the subconscious, and it does not update because you had a realisation — it updates when you give it a new experience. That is the whole formula, and it is simple: awareness, then choice, then action. You have the awareness. This is where the other two begin.

A should is not a decision you made. It is a program installed from outside — a rule you absorbed, young, about how you had to be in order to be loved. You never agreed to it. Which is exactly why you are allowed to question it.

STEP ONE — EMPTY OUT YOUR SHOULDs

Your rules cluster around one thing in particular: love. Write down every rule you live by, each beginning with “I should.” The first four are the ones this pattern almost always carries — keep the ones that are yours, cross out the ones that aren’t, and fill the rest with your own. For each, name whose voice it is.

THE SHOULD I CARRY	WHOSE VOICE IS IT?	BODY
I should not expect safe and exciting from the same person.
I should not fully trust it when love feels easy.
I should keep one foot out in case it disappears.
I should choose the love I could survive losing.
I should...
I should...
I should...
I should...

I should...

I should...

I should...

I should...

I should...

I should...

STEP TWO — FEEL WHICH ONES ARE YOURS

Go back through your list and say each one aloud — but change one word. Replace I should with I want to. Don't decide with your mind. Your body already knows, and it answers faster than thought.

A want opens you. Room, breath, energy moving toward something. A green light.

A should closes you. Tightness, a bracing in the chest, something in you going small. A red light.

Mark each line in the Body column: green if it opens you, red if it closes you. The reds were never yours — installed from outside, worn so long they feel like character. The greens are you. That is the whole exercise: your body sorting what you actually want from what you were trained to carry.

STEP THREE — ACT ON ONE WANT

Take one red — a should that closed you. Underneath it is a want it has been holding down. Find that want, and this week do one small, survivable thing that honours it instead of the should.

If “I should keep one foot out in case it disappears” came up red, the want beneath it is likely “I want to let myself be fully in something good.” So this week, you stay one beat longer in a moment of steady closeness you'd normally pull back from. That's the move: not resisting the should with willpower, but following the want it was burying.

You are not trying to become a different person. You are handing your subconscious one piece of evidence that the old rule isn't true — and evidence is the only language it updates in. One want, acted on, outweighs a hundred you merely understood. This is why the page has room for more than four shoulds: you will come back to it. Each time, a new rule, the same three moves.

What shifts when it resolves

The two stop being separate rooms. Safe stops meaning flat. Alive stops meaning unavailable. You become able to feel desire for someone who is actually there — and to stay, without your system reading steadiness as a cage.

You stop choosing love you can survive losing, because you finally believe you can have love worth keeping. The pull toward the uncertain ones loosens its grip, because it was never chemistry — it was recognition of an old wound, and the wound is closing.

The fear that you were the problem quietly dissolves. You were never built to sabotage the good ones. You were carrying a template that split what was always meant to live together — and you are putting it back.

Clients describe it like this: “The unavailable ones stopped being magnetic. I found that terrifying, and then I found it free.”

YOUR DECLARATION — YOURS TO KEEP

I used to choose love I could survive losing, because I didn't believe I could have love I actually wanted to keep.

If you want to love me well — as a partner, anyone asking for real closeness — be both. Safe and alive. I finally believe that exists, and that I deserve it.

This one isn't for the folder. Send it to the person you keep almost letting all the way in. Say it out loud, once. And keep it somewhere you'll see it — until it stops feeling like a stretch and starts feeling like the truth.

YOUR NEXT STEP

Where this goes next

Recognising the split is the easy part. Understanding how it was made — and how to hold safe and alive at once — is the work.

Your Knight in Shining Armour rests on a single premise: your relationship struggles were never the real problem — they're the map back to yourself. The people you've chosen have been pointing you to the wound all along, and the book shows you how to read that, and rewrite it.

It begins with an airport in Hong Kong and traces back to a classroom in Romania, where a version of me decided, very young, that she would never feel small again. If the Splitter is your pattern, that story will feel like your own.

A NOTE ON WHAT THIS DOCUMENT IS — AND ISN'T

This profile puts a pattern into words. It doesn't resolve it.

Recognition is the first move. It turns a diffuse sense that something keeps happening into something with an outline you can work with. But a pattern this old, stored this deep, doesn't release through insight alone. If it did, this document would be enough — and the clients who come to me after twenty years of therapy, perfectly aware of their patterns, wouldn't exist.

The practice in these pages is a beginning: a way to feel, in your body, that a rule you never chose can be put down. The book is how the deeper work is done.

Whatever you choose next, keep this document. Come back to it in three months. Notice what has changed, what hasn't, and what you can now see that wasn't visible today.

The pattern was built over years. Seeing it clearly once is a good day. Changing it is a different piece of work — and it is absolutely possible.
